Tobias Rehberger's installation transforms the lobby of the company Jarltech into a transition area, one which gives the effect of a psychedelic suction, due to its tunnel-like painting. Viewed from the outside, the black-and-white concentric pattern covering the floor, the walls and the ceiling of the lobby exerts a hypnotic pull up the stairs towards the centrepiece of the installation, a two-piece neon sign.

A vibrant red sofa invites the viewer to sit down and contemplate the neon signage placed in the left rear corner of the room. Originally conceived by Rehberger as a unique piece, the neon arrangement is a visual interpretation of the line »Forbidden in Heaven and Useless in Hell« from Marilyn Manson's song »Four Rusted Horses«. Although at first glance the randomly flickering, flashing neon installation gives one the impression that it is malfunctioning, it has been meticulously planned to do so by the artist. As if conveying a secret message to the viewer, the word »cash« constantly reappears out of the seemingly visual chaos: a visual reference to Jarltech's core business, POS systems.

Tobias Rehberger with Jaritech-CEO Ulrich Spranger

Whether the aptly titled installation is the antechamber to heaven or to hell is the viewer's decision. Maybe one of the cheerfully smiling clowns, each portraying Jarltech's CEO Ulrich Spranger, knows the journey's destination while looking down from the ceiling lamps.

»People go to a museum, look at a picture and then expect something to happen to them. I believe art should be treated less sacral. One should deal with it more naturally, even in everyday life. Why don't people just go to a museum and hang out, as if it were a café or a park? You don't have to stare at art all the time for it to have an effect.«
